New Technologies for Studies of Ancient Texts

Michael Toth, President of R.B. Toth Associates

Advanced imaging systems can now empower scholars, scientists and researchers to glean important, new information from ancient texts. This illustrated presentation will demonstrate how these imaging systems offer new insights into ancient manuscripts on parchment and papyrus. Advanced technologies developed during Mr. Toth’s projects – applied to papyri-mâché funeral masks and to ancient manuscripts guarded by monks at St. Catherine’s Monastery in the Sinai, for example – have already revealed a trove of previously obscured text and drawings.

Multispectral imaging offers new insights into layers of text in historic palimpsests: older writings that have been “washed away” and overwritten with newer text (as featured in the Washington Post: tinyurl.com/posttothsinai).

A carbonized, third century copy of Leviticus recovered at En-Gedi was recently subjected to multispectral imaging, and represents the first severely damaged, ink-based scroll to be unrolled and identified non-invasively. Thanks to these advancing technologies, scholars may now utilize an array of new imaging tools for non-destructive analysis and interdisciplinary research.
